At the corner where the fire truck dropped its hose it was necessary to use over 700 feet of hose to reach the fire and as the hose had to be pulled by hand, the barn was too far gone to save when the water was turned on. People living in the neighborhood wondered why the fire company attached their hose at the corner had used such a length of hose when there was a hydrant directly in front of the property on which the barn was located, and where not over 200 feet of hose would have been needed to reach the blaze, but as one of the men who came on the truck explained, the smelk seemed to come from in back of the house on the corner and they stopped there, thinking they were as near the fire as they could get, and when the mistake had been discovered the truck had become imbedded in the dirt and it was impossible to continue to a nearer hydrant.
